Then came the Veteran Reserves, marching and maneuvering like true and disciplined soldiers. Then came the 9th, 11th and 13th cavalry, on foot, but bearing themselves nobly. The whole was under the command of Gen Carrington, one of the most accomplished of officers on such occasions. In front of the State House the men were drawn up in battle array, to the admiration of many ladies who, from the balcony of Masonic Hall, waved their greeting with white handkerchiefs. After that they countermarched, and the outsiders, that is those who had not yet shouldered muskets, heard speeches from windy war riors in front of the Capitol. The venerable Col. James Blake called the meeting to order. He stated that it was called to ascertain how many ladies would take the pia ces of gentlemen whose business or other reason precluded their going to war. He said that it was not supposed that any lady who might volunteer would be ordered to the front; her services would chiefly be required in the rear. The vacuum in our miantry must be filled up. He had no doubt, however, that the demand now made upon Indianapolis would be filled by the male portion of the community. To day, he thought, the city's quota of the 20,000 just called for would be filled. This city, he would tell the ladies, was the center, and what was done here would be felt to the extreme circumference. The ladies had more power in this country than the President himself.
